Anyone searching for commercial properties for lease Southern California has to offer will quickly collect a stack of marketing flyers. These one- or two-page summaries are designed to grab attention, and they pack a lot of information into a small space. Knowing how to read them, and what they leave out, can save hours of touring buildings that were never a good fit.

A flyer is a starting point, not a final answer. It tells you enough to decide whether a property deserves a closer look, and it gives you the questions to ask next. When a listing looks promising, request more information from the listing team before scheduling a tour, so you can compare it against your requirements on equal terms.

The Anatomy of a Typical Flyer

Most commercial flyers follow a similar layout, whether the property is an office suite, an industrial building or a retail storefront. Common elements include:

- Headline and photos highlighting the property's best features
- Address and location map showing nearby freeways, landmarks and amenities
- Available square footage, sometimes broken down by suite or unit
- Asking rent or price, along with the lease type
- Property specifications such as zoning, parking, clear height or power
- Floor plan or site plan showing the layout
- Listing agent contact details

Each of these pieces deserves a careful read, because the details often matter more than the headline.

Decoding the Numbers on Commercial Properties for Lease Southern California

Asking rent is usually the first figure people notice, but it can be misleading without context. Commercial rents are often quoted per square foot per month in Southern California, though some flyers show annual figures. Always confirm which one you are reading.

The lease type is equally important. Common structures include:

1. Full service gross, where rent includes most operating expenses, common in multi-tenant office buildings
2. Modified gross, where some expenses are included and others are passed through
3. Triple net (NNN), where the tenant pays base rent plus a share of taxes, insurance and maintenance
4. Industrial gross, a variation sometimes used for industrial buildings

A building quoting a lower NNN rent may cost more in total than one quoting a higher gross rent, depending on the expense load. If a flyer lists estimated NNN charges, add them to base rent to compare properties fairly.

Understanding Square Footage

Square footage on a flyer may refer to rentable area, usable area or building area. In office buildings, rentable square footage typically includes a share of common areas such as lobbies and restrooms, which means the space you actually occupy may be smaller than the number on the page. Ask for the load factor to understand the difference.

For industrial properties, check how the total breaks down between warehouse and office area. A building with more office space than you need may not be efficient for your operation, and adding or removing office improvements has a cost.

Specifications That Deserve a Second Look

The specifications section is where flyers reveal whether a property can actually support your business. Pay close attention to:

- Zoning, which determines permitted uses
- Parking ratio, usually expressed as spaces per 1,000 square feet
- Clear height for industrial space, which affects storage capacity
- Loading doors, both dock-high and grade-level
- Power, stated in amps and voltage
- Sprinkler system type and coverage
- Year built or renovated, which can hint at building system condition

Reading Between the Lines

Marketing language is meant to be appealing. Terms such as "creative space," "prime location" or "value-add opportunity" can mean many things. A "value-add" retail center might have significant vacancy. "Flexible zoning" may still require permits for your particular use. Treat descriptive language as an invitation to investigate, not a guarantee.

Also look for what the flyer does not say. Missing information about rent, availability dates or expenses may simply mean the landlord prefers to discuss terms directly, or it may signal factors worth exploring. A licensed real estate broker representing you can request the details and interpret them. DAUM, which represents tenants, landlords and investors across Southern California, regularly helps clients compare flyers against actual requirements.
