How Insurance Companies Evaluate Car Accident Injury Claims in Washington

There is no single formula that determines the value of every Washington car accident injury claim. Insurance companies generally evaluate the available evidence about fault, the nature and extent of the injuries, medical treatment, financial losses, insurance coverage, and how well the claimed damages are documented.

For an injured person, understanding those categories can make the claims process less confusing. Puyallup personal injury attorney John Forsythe represents people injured in motor vehicle collisions and has prior defense-side experience that gives him perspective into how injury claims may be evaluated and challenged.

Liability: What Happened and Who Was at Fault?

An insurance carrier will first look at how the crash occurred. That evaluation may involve driver statements, a police report, photographs, witness information, vehicle damage, traffic laws, and other evidence.

Fault can directly affect the amount that may ultimately be recovered. Washington follows a comparative-fault rule. Under RCW 4.22.005, fault attributed to an injured claimant can proportionately reduce compensatory damages rather than automatically barring recovery.

That makes accurate documentation Personal Injury Lawyer Puyallup important, especially when the drivers disagree about how the collision happened.

Medical Evidence: What Injuries Were Caused by the Collision?

After liability, the insurer will look closely at the claimed injuries. Medical records can help document symptoms, diagnoses, treatment, functional limitations, referrals, and the course of recovery.

The key issue is not simply whether someone received medical Car accident lawyer Puyallup care. The records must help connect the treatment and claimed limitations to the accident. When symptoms change over time, consistent documentation can make the chronology easier to understand.

Some claims involve a relatively short course of care. Others involve surgery, prolonged rehabilitation, permanent limitations, or future treatment. Those differences can materially change the scope and complexity of a claim.

Financial Losses: What Did the Collision Cost?

Insurance companies may also evaluate economic losses caused by the crash. Those can include medical expenses, lost income, vehicle-related losses, and other documented costs that are legally recoverable under the circumstances.

If a person misses work, payroll records, employer documentation, tax information, or other records may be needed to establish the income loss. If future work ability is affected, the analysis can become more involved.

Washington consumers can also review the Office of the Insurance Commissioner's guidance on filing an auto insurance claim for general information about the claims process and policyholder responsibilities.

The Effect on Daily Life

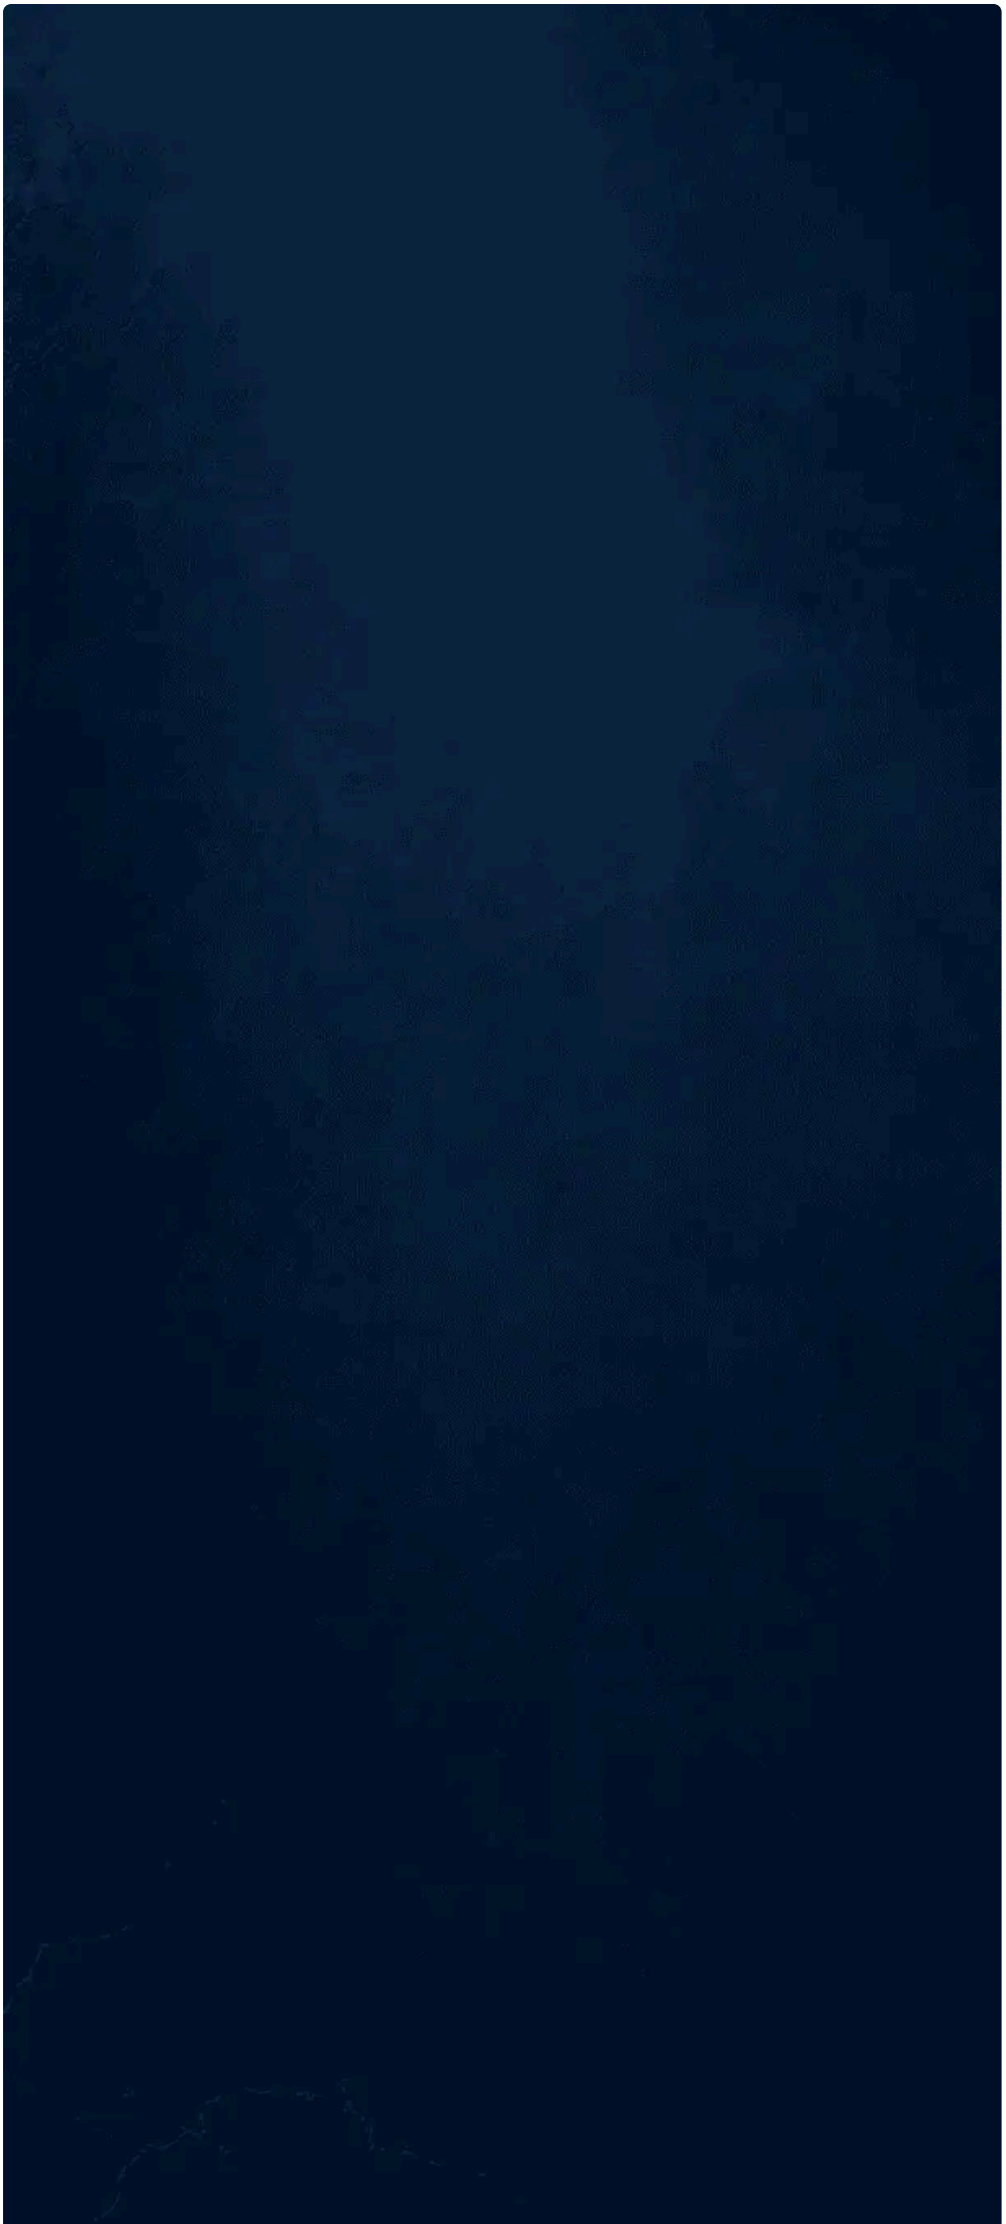

A serious injury can affect far more than medical bills. Depending on the case, an injured person may be unable to drive, work normally, exercise, care for family members, sleep comfortably, or participate in activities that were part of everyday life before the collision.

These effects are harder to show with a single invoice. Consistent medical records, personal documentation, employment records, and information from people familiar with the person's limitations may help explain the broader impact of the injury.

John Forsythe's personal injury FAQ emphasizes documenting both the financial losses and the way an accident has affected work and daily life.

Insurance Coverage and Policy Limits

Even when liability and damages are well supported, available insurance coverage matters. The at-fault driver's liability limits may affect what can be paid under that policy. In some cases, uninsured or underinsured motorist coverage under the injured person's own policy may also become relevant.

Other coverage, such as personal injury protection, can have a role in paying certain expenses when the coverage applies. The exact policy language, exclusions, limits, and coordination among coverages should be reviewed rather than assumed.

Consistency and Documentation Matter

An insurer evaluates a claim based on the information it has. Gaps or inconsistencies can create questions. For example, differences between an early statement and later account of the crash, missing records, unexplained treatment gaps, or unsupported wage-loss claims may require additional explanation.

This does not mean every claim must look perfect on paper. Real recoveries can be complicated. The goal is to present an accurate, organized record that explains what happened and how the injury affected the person.

Why Prior Defense-Side Experience Can Be Useful

John Forsythe has approximately 15 years of legal experience, including prior defense-side experience. That background can provide useful perspective when evaluating how an insurer may review liability, medical documentation, damages, and potential challenges to a claim.
