

Staying Connected: A Guide to Federal Inmate Texting

Staying connected with someone in a federal prison is hard, and most relatives look for a simpler way to reach out. Federal inmate texting gives friends and family a straightforward channel that fits into daily life. Messages are sent from a phone or computer and delivered through an approved federal messaging pathway, so the process feels familiar even though the rules are stricter than a standard text thread.

How Federal Inmate Texting Works

Every federal inmate communicates through the Bureau of Prisons electronic messaging system, commonly called TRULINCS. Inmates must hold an approved account, and contacts must be added to the inmate's list before messages can be exchanged. Understanding this structure helps families avoid delays and set realistic expectations about how quickly replies arrive.

What Is TRULINCS and Corrlinks?

TRULINCS is the Bureau of Prisons program that lets inmates send and receive email with approved contacts. Corrlinks is a name many families also search for, since it refers to similar correctional messaging platforms. Because facility messaging is monitored, every message must follow institutional guidelines, and content that breaks those rules can be rejected or flagged.

How ContactMeASAP Helps You Connect

ContactMeASAP is an independent texting service designed to make federal inmate communication easier to use from a smartphone. Families can search for an inmate by name or register number, then start a conversation once their account is set up. The platform is not operated by the Bureau of Prisons.

Pay as you go is a key part of the experience. Instead of committing to a long contract, users add funds when they choose and keep track of their balance. Unlimited messaging options and photo printing are also available, which lets families share pictures, milestones, and everyday updates.

Coverage Across Federal Facilities

The service searches all federal BOP facilities, so families with loved ones in different regions can manage every connection from one platform. Coverage includes messaging to contacts in the United States and Canada, with Puerto Rico available on premium plans. Review the current plan details before signing up to confirm what your contact is able to receive.

Security, Compliance, and Privacy

BOP compliance matters for every message sent through the platform. ContactMeASAP is built around facility rules and emphasizes secure handling of account information. Users should still read the privacy policy and never share login details with anyone outside the family. 24/7 text support is available when questions come up during setup.

ContactMeASAP is a women-owned business focused on making these connections simpler for families. Its mission is to reduce the stress of staying in touch across long distances and strict prison systems, so loved ones can keep relationships strong from any smartphone.
